“A Reappraisal of Scottish Medical Schools in influencing military medicine in the 18th and early 19th century Great Britain”

Hilary Morris

Hilary Morris is the first Apothecaries Lecturer for Brighton & Sussex Medical School and teaches students about the value of medical history as well as supervising individual research projects involving a historical perspective. Her current research focuses on the historical influence of military medicine in a civilian setting.

She also acts as a consultant for film, television and museums with a particular interest in medical history. Ms Morris has co-authored a history of medicine post-graduate text book which is currently being re-written and will have greater emphasis on the inclusion of medical humanities.
